The truly individual interior is still a rarity—the less-than-professional personal statement.

When we look back on 90s rooms, we will see beautifully textured fabrics of wool, silk, exotic woods, and veneers.
We will also see the emergence of “ready-to-wear” furniture from places like the Pottery Barn and Crate & Barrel.

The wave of minimalism should abate, leaving a thirst for more personal and layered environments. Look for square limestone bathtubs being used to water horses.

Trends that began in the 90s we hope will continue into the next century:
boutique hotels, photography as fine art, Chinese furniture, sisal and sea-grass rugs.

Technology became an integral part of design in the 90s, as did clean, serene, and functional rooms.

Faux painting is now a faux-pas in our office. What we treasure on walls in Venice we don't want to run into in condominium foyers in Venice Beach.
And if we never see another new Palladian window we will be ecstatic.

After the overblown frills of the 80s the spare look of many 90s rooms was a relief. It should last.

If money were no object, I would have my own personal carpenter, acres and acres of land, a hundred more years—and, why not, a license to speed.
